

What I Have Learned In This Semester

This semester had a lot of projects that really challenged me. During the beginning, I had a very negative outlook on it, as with all students does. But after a while, I realized that maybe that this was something that can help me in the future.

Now, why did I say that I had a negative first impression of the project? Simply because I thought it crammed our schedules, with its constantly pushy deadlines. However, over time I realized that it helps us, the students with self-discipline and how well we can handle pressure. I have discovered a few interesting things while doing these projects. Like how blogs and websites similar to it, is not actually difficult to make. But like all things there were negative things I learned, an example was that some people, sometimes even my own teammates don't even bother with learning something as simple as making a blog.

While making the projects, which involved a lot of researching the most difficult part was looking for an article that we can rely on, along with credible sources. I've also discovered that you really have to follow instruction, one wrong misunderstanding and your score is going down the drain. Like I have said earlier, these projects allowed us to test our self-discipline, something I learned that I have to improve on. Everything boils down to self-discipline when it comes to being time-conscious and having the first initiative.

I have talked about teammates earlier; well I'm going to continue on that topic again with saying that there were people I was grouped with that really lacked in communication. Some of them didn't even bother to contact me, I had to take initiative. I don't mean that this applies to all the people I've worked with, some of them were great, where I felt we were really a team. It really just depends on the people I'm working with.